Q12 has been asked to those experiencing recruitment difficulties.
Retention difficulties

- Not only are employers struggling to recruit for many positions, but the staff can be hard to retain too.

- The order of ‘precariousness’ of positions for retention mostly mirrors recruitment – jobs involved in the preparation and serving of food & drink.

- As discussed earlier, drivers are hard to recruit, but retaining them is not as difficult.

Some issues around treatment

- Long and/or unplanned hours
  - Not getting breaks at peak times
  - Expectations of being ‘on call’ to come in on planned non-working days
  - Can be too hard for parents of young children
- Condescending treatment by customer
- Unprofessional treatment by management
  - Some feel discriminated against by management
  - Conflict can occur when a customer complains. Default assumptions is that the customer is right
  - Little positive feedback
About two in three (64%) say they are paid by the hour in their current / most recent job in the sector.

Around half (52%) of those earn between €10.01 and €12 per hour.

Pay is a common source of dissatisfaction in this sector because of what is expected of employees in terms of unsocial hours.

Changing workers’ minds

- For most workers not looking to be in tourism & hospitality, the situation is recoverable
- But they won’t reconsider unless the issues raised are addressed
- Some issues are harder to change than others, such as unsocial hours
- Employees see the issues as the employers’ cause and responsibility to put right

Q27 "Is there anything that a tourism & hospitality employer could do to make you consider working in their business?"

- Better basic pay: 62%
- Similar entitlements to other jobs: 56%
- Perks / benefits beyond pay: 54%
- Predictable working schedule: 48%
- Less unsocial hours: 45%
- Better working environment: 43%
- More opportunities for progression: 42%
- Job security / longer term contracts: 33%
- Clearly defined terms & conditions: 32%
- Other: 4%
- Nothing would make me reconsider: 11%

Q27 has been asked to those who do not work in the sector and are not looking to, or they work in the sector but are looking to get out.
Tourism and hospitality in all countries reviewed faces a similar set of circumstances for very similar reasons. The common challenges are

- Unfilled roles and lack of suitable applicants
- Difficulties retaining staff
- Upward wage pressure
- Lack of international workers

A lot of reliance on public sector bodies to produce solutions.

This points to a disconnect between the source of the challenge and ownership of the solution.
Consultations with Recruitment Agents

- Confusion among jobseekers around (a) role profiles and (b) role levels
- Less defined career paths in tourism and hospitality
- Strong competition for international mobile workers
- Some employers’ expectations are unrealistic, e.g., looking for international experience yet offering minimum wage
- Some employers are being creative with their hours and shift patterns while building in predictability
- Seeing improved terms, conditions and perks
- Better organised employers get better recruitment results
Implications
Implications

1. The issues are universal to tourism and hospitality across all sub-sectors and many countries.

2. Doing nothing is not an option. It is sellers' market – unprecedented labour market mobility and exceptional competition between sectors.

3. Demand is certain to return, yet tourism’s recovery is at risk.

4. Employers must make the job more attractive and should get ahead of the market.
